2025-2026

I. INTRODUCTION

Wood has played an important role in the history of civilization. Humans have used it for fuel, building materials, furniture, paper, tools, weapons, and more. And demand for wood continues to increase annually, spurring conflicts between neighboring states over control of shared resources. Our relationship to these resources has remained relatively unchanged overtime and our methods of developing and managing woodlands continue to rely on tried-and-true techniques established by early civilizations. So perhaps this is why we take it for granted: wood has long been a part of our lives, and we probably can't really imagine it not being there.

Based on the national research, wood is by far the most important forest product and is now playing a dominant role in today's wood economy. With the constantly increasing demand for wood and wood-based products, Philippines requires 6 million cubic meters of wood annually based on the average consumption of wood from 2006-2014 (FMB 2015) and this demand for wood is projected to increase in the next few years. Out of this national demand for wood, only 25% comes from local source while 75% are imported (<https://forestry.denr.gov.ph/>).

Lumber typically refers collectively to wood that's been processed for use as a building material-wood that has been milled and cut into boards or planks. This cutting happens in a small lumbermill, and the finished product is sold at lumberyard.

Based on Statistics Research Department, in 2020 the total volume of lumber produced in the Philippines amounted to 284.16 thousand cubic meters, reflecting an increase from the previous year. The production volume of lumber in the country has been fluctuating in the past three years.
